DESTINY.

BY ROBERT ALEX. DOUGLAS-LITEGOW X. D. LL.D. [Copyright, 1893, by the Author.]

HE London se son was at its height, and the Park and Row with rank fashion and beauty It was a love ly June afternoon and the Sauntering by the side of the Row, Hon. Bertie Milverton and his Fidus Achates, Bruce Armitage, were evidently enjoying the occasion, for they were both known to almost everybody; and as they walked arm-in-arm they doffed their hats at almost every step to society's pet dames and maidens, o now and again stopped for a few minutes to make observations on the weath er to some more familiar friends.

Bertie Milverton had been the "catch" of many seasons, for, as the eldest son of Lord Somerby he was helr to his father's immense wealth and property, and many a Mayfair and Belgravian mother had sighed when season after season their daughters failed to make any impression upon such an eligible parti

A long drooping mustache neutralized the effeminate regularity of his classic

> In fact he was about as good a type of the English aristocracy as society could boast, and one of the best known and most admired men about town. Society wondered at his passing so long heartwhole and unscathed through such a galaxy of beauty, until it had almost assured itself that he was either heartless or simply invulnerable to the shafts of Cupid.

Bruce Armitage, his friend and fellow guardsman, was about the same age as Bertie, a fair specimen of a modern Anglo-Saxon and the son of Sir Nigel Armitage, a cavalry officer who had especially distinguished himself in

They were about to cross the Row at Albert Gate when coming towards them they saw a middle-aged man accompanied by two young ladies. As soon as they passed Bruce exclaimed: "By Jove, Milverton! Did you notice that lovely girl? I wonder who she is?' Milverton said: "Yes, I did notice her, and she is certainly charming! I only glanced at her, but I shall never forget that beautiful face or those

"Hit hard, old fellow?" said Bruce, but Milverton replied: "Let us walk back and see if we can meet them However, they were unsuccessful,

But it seemed as if a demon of unrest had entered into him, for wherever people assembled-at dinners, balls, "at homes," concerts, theaters, the opera, the park, Hurlingham, Sandownthere poor Milverton was to be seenexcited, but not with the excitement which surrounded him, but rather with an unappeasable and unrestrained desire to see once more the charming girl whom he had only seen for a moment n passing. His friend Bruce had divined the cause of his altered appearance, habits and manners, and toward the end of the season had openly taxed him with being in love, when Milverton said:

"Well, old boy, it's no use trying to conceal my passion from you, and I must tell somebody or I shall go mad! You know I have never felt more than a passing interest in any of the season's beauties, or indeed in anybody with the idea of finding a wife." "On the contrary," said Bruce, "I have often wondered why you appeared so cold and heartless."

"I have not worn my heart on my sleeve, Bruce, but it is all right and capable of the most intense and vehement passion; but I have long schooled myself to believe that I should know I sent to an asylup in a moment the woman I could love, for I have formed my ideal, and I feel that my future is in the hands of destiny, but now that I have seen her, God help me, I neither know who or where she is!"

It was easy to see how deeply he was moved, and as Bruce tried to comfort him, he bowed his head on his hands and sobbed like a child.

The season was over, and Milverton had accepted several shooting engage-ments — Scotland, Norfolk and else-

These over, he went to Yorkshire for a ball at the Chestermans', on the ocson, Lord Hazelmere. He arrived in time for dinner, and Lord and Lady Chesterman, exercising the privilege of old friends, told him be was not looking well and said it was really time he had sown his wild oats and settled down. He quite agreed with them, and, as sual when the subject was mentioned.

of other and less personal matters. However, he enjoyed his dinner, especially after his long railway journey. and the party entered the ballroom about half past ten o'clock. Milverton watched the guests arrive, and greeted many old friends. During a temporary lull he was speaking to Lady Chesterman, when "Mr. and Miss Hillyer" were announced, and Milverton almost fainted when he recognized the beautiful girl whom he had seen in the park during the season.

To beg an introduction was the work of a moment, and he blushed unac-countably when he asked her for the pleasure of the first dance, which she gracefully conceded. Their step suited admirably, and as Milverton, a capital dancer, steered her round the room, he felt in the seventh heaven of delight. and his eyes sparkled with the rapture to which he had surrendered himself.

He could not, however, surrender his charming partner without an effort. and so asked her to accompany him to the conservatory, where the air was more cool and refreshing.

As he sat beside her he felt that his destiny had come, and resolved to know his fate as speedily as possible.

He, however, succeeded so far in con trolling himself as to engage in ordinary conversation at first, during which he elicited that her name was Etheldreda-that her father was rector of Wisborough, in the neighborhood, and took a deep interest in Anglo-Saxon literature-and that she was not en-

He then told her of himself, in which account he fancied she seemed interested, but it was her turn to wonder when he added that he knew she was not engaged, as he had been waiting for her all his life! He extenuated his presumption by detailing his theory as she remembered passing him in the park during the season, with her uncle and cousin, he became all the more enraptured, and assured her that he felt then as he felt now that in their thus meeting, it was the hand of fate that had brought them face to face, although only for a moment.

It only remains to be added that soclety was much moved when the announcement of their engagement was published, that the marriage duly took place from Norman-Keep, the residence of the earl and countess of Chesterman, that Bruce Armitage was best man and that Hon, and Mrs. Bertie Milverton lived happily ever afterwards. So much for destiny, and "those lovely eyes!"

A Curious Lease.

A Biddeford (Me.) attorney had in his possession a lease the like of which local lawyers do not believe can be found in existence. The names of the parties to the lease according to the Kennebec Journal, are given, but its provisions are none the less strange. The lease is of a lot of land at an annual rental of $440 for twenty-five years, with the provision that the lessee should within one year build and maintain a substantial three-story building of brick, iron and stone When the lease expired the lessee was to have his choice between buying the building he had himself erected or of taking a perpetual lease of the lot at $850 a year, just double the original rent. The lease expired a year or so ago, and the lessee, to whom it was a case of "Hobson's choice," elected to take the perpetual lease of the lot. What puzzles the attorneys who have seen the lease is why a man of the property which the lessee must have been possessed should bind himself to such a one-sided condition. The gentleman who has the lease intends to present it to the Bar Library associa-
